A New Work By Persico.-James G. Bennett, in a recent letter from Paris, gives an account of a visit to the Studio of Persico, in which he found a new statue that the artist had just completed for a Russian Countess of wealth. He says:

"It is difficult to describe the design, but here goes the attempt. It was in paradise, and I think on the sixth or seventh morning after the creation of heaven and earth. The sun was shining over the garden of Eden-the trees were quivering in the morning breeze-the flowers throwing off their fragrance in every direction. On a small block of marble, half way between the tree of knowledge and the tree of life, and under the shade of a beautiful acacia, there was sitting, with one leg under the other thigh, a female in the full bloom of health, beauty and youth. It was Eve, just after her creation by the Lord God, but before Liver, and if not taken

In this point of view I think the statue of Persico presents a design more pure, more exquisite, more sublime, than that of Venus de Medicis. The Venus always seems to me, from the attitude and position, to represent a beautiful woman, who had just discovered that she had lost her drapery, and would give any price, even six shillings a yard, for a chemise or a night gown. Some of the proportions in Perwould take this opportunity of returning thanks to their numerous friends and the public for past favors, and would respectfully solicit a continuance of the same.
